

FCC:

I have read recently that some people are opposed to having to obtain permission in writing to send commercial advertising faxes. Having litigated several cases where phony evidence was made up of alleged permission given to send commercial faxes, I can attest to the need for a signed writing for permission. Also, many people in organizations in which they support will receive faxes that they do not really want, but because they do not want to offend their organization, or simple time constraints, do not take the steps to stop what are in fact unsolicited faxes. The new rule will make the organization get permissions from its members and thereby run a meaner and more efficient organization. The FCC should not change its revised rule which requires a signature demonstrating permission was given.

On another note, the FCC should change what I understand to be a position that placing one's name on the national do not call list still requires one to tell each and every person they do business with not to call. A request to place one's name on the national do not call list is a request not to be solicited, period, including businesses you do or may do business with in the future.
